Graham Gibbs has been one of the UK's most well known advocates of improving university learning and teaching. With his colleagues (Habeshaw & Habeshaw), he was responsible for the very popular '53 Interesting Ideas' books series that have supported countless teachers (new and experienced) navigate their way through tricky classroom and curriculum dilemmas. Gibbs has now turned his hand to a new blog 53 Powerful Ideas all Teachers Should Know About.

In this year's Teaching@Sydney, we will point you to a number of those ideas as an opportunity to stimulate your teaching practice. From the blog, this edition's powerful idea: Students are selectively negligent, and successful students neglect the right stuff.

Enjoy!
